Facts

- The interior features a tall atrium served by panoramic elevators, full of gold-plated ornaments and byzantine splendor.
- The main designer was the Turkish architect Vahap Toy, and the exterior's design resembles that of Blue City.
- The building's exterior architecture was widely criticised when it was built, as a deviation from the street's character and for its unconventional color scheme.
- Originally named Reform Plaza, the building suffered a long period of vacancies. But in 2002 Bank Millenium S.A. leased 9 full office floors in one of Polish real estate's largest leasing transactions. To honor the new tenant a new name - Millenium Plaza - was chosen.

- Despite its young age the building has already undergone a modernization: in 2002 three external (though not panoramic) elevators were added to the east façade to solve transportation difficulties.
