Facts

- The Ingalls Building was the first reinforced-concrete skyscraper in the world.
- See the Medical Arts Building in Dallas to continue a timeline of advances in high buildings of reinforced concrete.
- Reflecting its importance as the first high-rise of its type, the Ingalls Building was designated a National Historic Civil Engineering Landmark in 1974.
- It was named for its principal financier and president of the Big Four Railroad Company, Melville Ingalls.
- It was added to the National Register of Historic Places in 1975.
- The same architects were also responsible for Cincinnati's first steel-framed high-rise, the Neave Office Building, formerly located one block to the west.
